Abstract:

The abstract should be below 250 words. The abstract should not contain any undefined abbreviations and references. It should represent the location and purpose of the research, major methodology, the main findings, and the conclusion.

Main Text

The main text of the article should be split into clearly labeled sections. Usually, these will be Introduction, materials and methods, results and discussion, conclusion and suggestions. Author(s) should combine results and discussion.

- Introduction: The introduction should concisely discuss the global and local context. It should define the purpose and overall goal of the work and its importance.
- Materials and Methods: Types and source of the research materials should be presented. New methods and protocols should be described in detail, while well-established standard methods can be briefly described with appropriate citation. Brand names of equipment, name and version of any software used, and concentrations and quantities of chemical solutions should be described as appropriate.
- Results and Discussion: Provide a precise description of the experimental results and their interpretations. Authors should also discuss the findings and their implications in the broadest context possible and the limitations of the work highlighted. Future research directions may also be discussed.
- Conclusion and Suggestions: This section should briefly present the principal conclusions of the work. This section may present the major suggestions based on the findings. Conclusion and suggestions should be within the specific objectives.
- Article length: The length of research and review articles should not exceed 2500 words.
- Length for Case Reports, and short communications: The length of the case study and short communication should not exceed 1500 words.
